In England, the channels for the employment of capital are filled almost to overflowing; in America, the natural capabilities of the country have not been so far exhausted, and the capitalist is tempted, by the high rate of profit, to increase his demand for labour. Both capital, therefore, and objects on which it can be profitably employed, are essential to the maintenance of high wages. The natural resources of a country alone afford an imperfect criterion of its ability to support and employ labourers. England, in the twelfth century, possessed the same advantages of situation, of climate, of soil, mineral treasures, and extent of territory, when it was not able to maintain one-sixth of its present amount of population. These advantages, doubtless, have hastened its progress in wealth and civilisation, but that has been all. Before the richest soil can be cultivated, capital, or the produce of anterior industry, must be provided for the support of the labourers employed upon it; as it must be provided for those engaged in manufactures, or any other department of industry. If the wealth of a country has been long stationary, we must not expect to find the wages of labour very high in it; for, while the funds for the payment of wages have continued the same, the number of hands seeking employment may have increased. In this case, there would be a constant scarcity of work, and labourers would bid against each other to get it. If wages had ever been more than sufficient to maintain the labourer, the competition for employment and the interest of masters would soon reduce them to the lowest rate compatible with the lowest subsistence.
