

An excellent critic said lately, that the Germans regard productions of this kind as poems. That is exactly my idea of them. Poetry is not necessarily confined to verse - much less has it any thing to do with prose run mad: but in the soberest and freest diction, the highest qualities of poetry - imagination, sentiment, and feeling may be developed. A most absurd doctrine respecting works of A imagination, has been broached of late years, and one that I have been surprised to see avowed in the criticisms of some, who ought to know better the principles of their own art. If it has been their lot to review a work which has been deficient in interest, they have thought it ample explanation of the cause of that deficiency to say, - the author has, unfortunately, laid the scene of his work beyond the range of our sympathies; it is too distant in time or in country. Now, if this doctrine must be received as truth, then will follow one of the most singular and amazing deductions imaginable. What, indeed, becomes then of the historic interest of the early books of the Bible? What becomes of Homer? They are surely as distant in point of time, as any work written in the present day can be. Nay, what becomes of the most splendid productions of the ancients? If distance VOL. I.
